

Snow Goddess: Energy Ladder Angle Portfolio — Source-Only Final

Governing methodology adopted

This portfolio adopts the user-supplied Energy Ladder exactly.

| Ladder rung      | What it is                                                  | Snow Goddess example                                                                                                                               | Do not confuse it with                           |
|------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------|
| Mechanism | What the product / treatment is intended to do              | Raise energy through nutrition; support stress resilience; for the ferritin seeker, improve ferritin/iron is a treatment mechanism she researches. | The reason she buys.                             |
| Desire    | The resource she wants                                      | “I want more energy.”                                                                                                                              | The exact life use.                              |
| Angle     | What she wants to spend energy on; the finite reason to buy | “Get through the day without another recovery nap.”                                                                                                | The ingredient, mechanism, or ultimate identity. |
| Outcome   | What spending that energy produces                          | A normal day, a dinner made, a workday that does not erase the evening.                                                                            | A product promise.                               |
| Identity  | Who that outcome lets her be                                | A person who has an evening, a capable worker, an active woman.                                                                                    | The angle.                                       |
| Scene     | The recognisable door into the angle                        | Sitting in the driveway after work; trainers beside the bed; a ferritin spreadsheet; waking at 2 a.m. after a nap.                                 | The one reason to buy.                           |

Rule: Pitch at the angle rung. Use the scene to make her recognise herself. Use the mechanism and product composition to explain why Snow Goddess is worth considering.

Do not sell the outcome or identity as though a capsule produced it.

Evidence rule

The corpus itself says that not every avatar-assigned record contains an angle: 173 of 308 assigned records named a purchasable outcome, while 135 did not. Its manual validation then reduced 194 record-angle pairs to 82 quote-proven pairs. Therefore, this portfolio does not force an angle into every source or turn every high-emotion problem into a reason to buy.[1]

| Evidence label                  | Requirement                                                                                                                           | Deployment decision                                                                   |
|---------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| QP — quote-proven angle  | A woman states the desired action / use of energy, or the source directly asks for relief from the precise life constraint.           | Final test candidate.                                                                 |
| FP — faithful paraphrase | Multiple independent source units describe the same lost action; the angle compresses that language without adding a new destination. | Test candidate, marked as paraphrase.                                                 |
| Scene / recognition only | Strong problem, emotion, medical context, or visual moment but no adequately evidenced energy-spending destination.                   | Use as hook/scene; pair with a QP or FP angle if the individual creative supports it. |
| Mechanism / bridge only  | Product or treatment explanation, not an expressed energy use.                                                                        | Use after the angle.                                                                  |

The product role in every ad

Snow Goddess can be consistently positioned as the mechanism / product bridge:

Nutrition that helps put more back into a body being asked to do more, with organ ingredients and Arctic botanicals used to support energy and stress resilience.

That line is never the angle. In the creative structure, it comes after the woman recognises the specific thing she misses.

Scene → angle → familiar failed path → nutrition-and-stress-support mechanism →

Avatar 1 — Ferritin Researcher

| Rung                  | Source-only classification                                                                                                                                  |
|-----------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Mechanism she pursues | Getting ferritin / iron checked and treated; oral iron, infusions, dietary iron, and other routes appear in the sources. This is not the angle rung. |
| Desire                | More energy and normal cognitive / physical functioning.                                                                                                    |
| Final angle #1 | Get through the day without another recovery nap. FP                                                                                                 |
| Final angle #2 | Get my brain power back. FP                                                                                                                          |
| Final angle #3 | Find a routine I can stick with when the current pills make me feel worse. FP                                                                        |
| Scene                 | The ferritin rabbit hole: retests, the pill bottle, iron side effects, waiting for an infusion, tracking a number, sleeping after a full night.             |
| Outcome               | More capacity for work and ordinary life.                                                                                                                   |
| Identity              | “The energy of a normal person” ; a woman who does not need recovery naps to survive a day.                                                                 |

Why these are the final angles

The manual source scorecard supports the recovery-nap angle with four independent units / four threads, brain-power with four units / three threads, and treatment-routine persistence with four units / four threads.[2]

“I usually sleep 7–10hrs and still usually need 1–3 hour nap ... I used to have the energy of a normal person.” — SRC-014::t3_122f21c::t1_jdq6ybu

“My brain fog was so bad it felt like I was completely shut off.” — SRC-026::t3_1c429br::t1_nenkqra

What is not a final angle

“Raise ferritin,” “get my iron up,” “restore iron stores,” “avoid infusions,” and “make bloods normal” sit at the mechanism/treatment rung or remain unproven as exact final customer wording in the accepted quote bank. They may be real treatment desires or research hypotheses; they are not the final energy-spending angle in this portfolio without direct quote support.

Avatar 2 — Energy Rationer

| Rung           | Source-only classification                                                                                                                                       |
|----------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Mechanism      | Nutrition and stress support as a different daily routine after coffee, pacing, and survival mode.                                                               |
| Desire         | More energy.                                                                                                                                                     |
| Final angle #1 | Have something left after work. FP                                                                                                                               |
| Final angle #2 | Have enough energy for dinner too. FP                                                                                                                            |
| Final angle #3 | Stop spending your days off recovering. FP                                                                                                                       |
| Scene          | The commute home; horizontal on the sofa; a kitchen she cannot face; one simple grocery trip followed by two hours resting; the office using all of her battery. |
| Outcome        | A usable evening or weekend.                                                                                                                                     |
| Identity       | A person who has a life beyond the non-negotiables.                                                                                                              |

Why these are the final angles

These are not one-off imagined destinations. Each has three independent source anchors. “After work” is the broadest entry; dinner and days off are the specific execution scenes underneath it.[2]

“My job is taking all the energy that I have. I used to be able to do things after work, and now I just can’ t.” — SRC-004::t3_1vbrth7::t1_p10jwsu

“One of [the three chores] was to just cook dinner.” — SRC-006::t3_1tod8q4::t1_oo4z8b6

What stays as scene only

“Have enough left for your kid’ s life,” “be present for your partner,” and “still have an evening that belongs to you” are not final broad angles. They are a parent, partner, or identity scene only when the individual source/creative supports that role.

Avatar 3 — Rest-Guilt Loop

| Rung           | Source-only classification                                                                                                       |
|----------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Mechanism      | Nutrition / stress support after coffee, sleep, exercise, or “try harder” has not lifted the rest loop.                          |
| Desire         | More usable energy.                                                                                                              |
| Final angle #1 | Stop losing your day to naps. FP                                                                                                 |
| Final angle #2 | Wake up without dreading the day. FP                                                                                             |
| Final angle #3 | Rest without the guilt spiral. FP                                                                                                |
| Scene          | “A little nap” after work becomes waking in the early hours; counting down to bedtime; lying in bed while chores or people wait. |
| Outcome        | A day not defined by recovery.                                                                                                   |
| Identity       | Someone who can rest normally rather than disappear into it.                                                                     |

Why these are the final angles

The nap / dread / guilt pattern is independently repeated in the preselected manual evidence: four threads for lost days to naps, three for dread, and three for guilt.[2]

“I fall asleep after getting home from work thinking I’ ll take a little nap ... and I don’ t wake up until the early hours of the morning.” — SRC-024::t3_1s6iakx::t1_od3m9uc

“I count down the minutes until it’ s bed time so I can literally just shut my eyes and not feel guilty about it.” — SRC-006::t3_1tod8q4::t1_oo0ygui

Avatar 4 — Menopause-Anxiety Energy Seeker

| Rung                  | Source-only classification                                                                                                                          |
|-----------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Mechanism             | A women-focused nutrition / stress-support formula is the product bridge; HRT and other care pathways are part of the surrounding solution context. |
| Desire                | More energy and relief from the fearful, trapped feeling.                                                                                           |
| Final angle #1 | Get through the morning without panic. FP                                                                                                    |
| Final angle #2 | Stop feeling trapped in a low-energy life. FP                                                                                                |
| Final angle #3 | Get enough energy for ordinary life again. FP                                                                                                |
| Scene                 | Waking anxious; lying in bed panicking over everything that must be done; a shower feeling like a marathon; work affected by fatigue.               |
| Outcome               | Being able to live ordinary life rather than hide from it.                                                                                          |
| Identity              | Herself, rather than someone confined to a smaller life.                                                                                            |

Why these are the final angles

The manual scorecard has three independent anchors for all three formulations. The exact sentences are paraphrases of stated panic, hiding, fatigue, inability to live normally, and explicit “I need to be able to live my life” language.[2]

“All I want to do is hide in my bed and I have no energy to do anything ... panicking about all the things I should be doing.” — SRC-006::t3_1tod8q4::OP

“I need to be able to live my life.” — SRC-029::t3_1syij52::OP

What stays scene only

“Train consistently again” is a valid scene for an individual former runner, hiker, cyclist, or gym-goer, but it does not yet meet the multi-source, avatar-specific threshold to replace the three lines above.

Avatar 5 — Dismissed Energy Seeker

Important correction: this is primarily a recognition avatar, not an angle-rich avatar

| Rung               | Source-only classification                                                                                                                         |
|--------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Mechanism          | A different nutrition / stress-support routine is product positioning—not an answer to medical dismissal.                                          |
| Desire             | More energy and an end to uncertainty.                                                                                                             |
| Final angle status | No quote-proven energy-spending angle currently passes the strict threshold.                                                                |
| Recognition lines  | “Feel like your low energy is finally taken seriously” ; “stop being told to push through” ; “stop second-guessing what your body is telling you.” |
| Scene              | Being told normal, all in your head, depression, age, stress, or nothing is wrong; repeated appointments; being refused tests.                     |
| Outcome            | External validation and a credible next step.                                                                                                      |
| Identity           | A woman who believes herself again.                                                                                                                |

What the data really supports

The manual evidence strongly supports three recognition / emotional-desire lines: being taken seriously (five threads), no longer being told to push through (four), and no longer second-guessing her body (three).[2]

They are not automatically the angle rung under the supplied methodology because they do not state what she will spend regained energy on. Use them as the first 5–10 seconds only when the individual creative then lands on an energy-use angle actually supported by the source.

“I’ve been tired since I was 27. Can’t find a dr to take it seriously.” — SRC-037::t3_1f6crxo::t1_ll0sj2e

This is a vital portfolio lane, but the absolute truth is: current data establishes the wound better than it establishes a distinct purchasable energy destination.

Avatar 6 — Organ-Supplement Trial Evaluator

Important correction: solution-aware desires are product-selection desires

| Rung                          | Source-only classification                                                                                       |
|-------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Mechanism                     | Organ ingredients / formula composition.                                                                         |
| Desire                        | More energy or nutritional support.                                                                              |
| Final solution-aware angle #1 | Find an organ supplement that actually works for me. QP — direct, one source                                     |
| Final solution-aware angle #2 | Get a clean energy boost from an organ supplement. QP — direct, one source                                       |
| Final solution-aware angle #3 | Choose an organ formula with the qualities I am researching. FP                                                  |
| Scene                         | Comparing brand lists, sourcing, freeze-drying, aftertaste, fillers, and whether the product makes a difference. |
| Outcome                       | A product choice she can justify.                                                                                |
| Identity                      | An informed category buyer.                                                                                      |

The hard truth about this lane

The direct “works for me” and “clean energy boost” lines appear in one accepted source ( SRC-021::t3_1q12o87::OP ). They are real, but single-source. They are valid narrow solution-aware tests, not evidence that the whole market wants reindeer specifically.[2]

“Not another generic beef-organ capsule,” “a different animal,” and “a formula built for women” are Snow Goddess positioning / bridge lines, not quote-proven customer angles. Use them after the customer has selected herself through a real angle.

Avatar 7 — HRT Partial-Response Energy Seeker

| Rung           | Source-only classification                                                                                                                      |
|----------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Mechanism      | A next nutrition / stress-support option alongside an existing HRT route; HRT itself is product-experience context.                             |
| Desire         | More energy after partial improvement.                                                                                                          |
| Final angle #1 | Address the part still unresolved: your energy. FP                                                                                       |
| Final angle #2 | Stop settling for better but still exhausted. FP                                                                                         |
| Final angle #3 | Get a next step after partial results. FP                                                                                                |
| Scene          | Hot flashes, sleep, brain fog, or anxiety improved, but she still naps, cannot exercise, cannot work normally, or wants to stay home and sleep. |
| Outcome        | Energy that catches up with the parts of life still missing.                                                                                    |
| Identity       | Herself again, not merely “better on paper.”                                                                                                    |

Why these remain final angles

All three have three independent curated source anchors. The critical direct evidence is not “HRT failed.” It is “HRT helped some things, but fatigue/energy did not resolve, so what else can I try?” [2]

“HRT has been wonderful for helping me with brain fog, sleep, hot flashes and anxiety. But I am still so so soooo unbearably tired.” — SRC-069::t3_1uig6p6::OP

“No night sweats or hot flushes so far ... but no improvement in fatigue.” — SRC-001::t3_14dcr5l::OP

Final test order under the Energy Ladder

The ranks below order the current final candidates by replication, angle-rung fit, specificity, and ability to produce multiple recognisable scenes. They are hypotheses ordered for paid testing, not proof of market size or product efficacy.

| Test order | Avatar               | Final angle                                              | Evidence status                  | Scene pool                                                       |
|------------|----------------------|----------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------|
| 1          | Energy Rationer      | Have something left after work.                   | FP; 3 threads                    | Office / commute / sofa / kitchen / grocery recovery.            |
| 2          | Rest-Guilt Loop      | Stop losing your day to naps.                     | FP; 4 threads                    | After-work nap becomes 2 a.m.; errands → bed; nap guilt.         |
| 3          | Ferritin Researcher  | Get through the day without another recovery nap. | FP; 4 threads                    | Test / pill / infusion rabbit hole; full night's sleep then nap. |
| 4          | Menopause-Anxiety    | Stop feeling trapped in a low-energy life.        | FP; 3 threads                    | Morning panic; shower marathon; hiding in bed.                   |
| 5          | HRT Partial-Response | Address the part still unresolved: your energy.   | FP; 3 threads                    | Other symptoms better, energy still not back.                    |
| 6          | Energy Rationer      | Have enough energy for dinner too.                | FP; 3 threads                    | Frozen dinner; staring at kitchen; dinner with partner.          |
| 7          | Rest-Guilt Loop      | Wake up without dreading the day.                 | FP; 3 threads                    | Open eyes already dreading bedtime countdown.                    |
| 8          | Dismissed            | Recognition only: “Feel                           | Direct emotional evidence; not a | Normal-result / doctor-dismissal                                 |

|   |                 |                                                             |                           |                                                                                   |
|---|-----------------|-------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|   |                 | taken seriously.”                                    | confirmed angle-rung line | scene, then hand off to an angle from the same individual source where available. |
| 9 | Organ Evaluator | Find an organ supplement that actually works for me. | QP; single source         | Ingredient / sourcing / brand-comparison scene.                                   |

What must be collected before expanding the final angle list

The next data pass must seek desired-use-of-energy language, not merely more descriptions of fatigue. Store the verbatim quote and tag the ladder rung.

| Collection question                          | Angle-quality answer                                                                                | Do not count as an angle      |
|----------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------|
| “If you had more energy, what would you do?” | “I miss my early morning runs” ; “I want to do swim class with my child” ; “I want to cook dinner.” | “I’ m exhausted.”             |
| “What part of your day do you lose?”         | “I lose every evening to the sofa” ; “I nap after grocery shopping.”                                | “Fatigue is terrible.”        |
| “What would tell you it was working?”        | “I could get through work and still make dinner.”                                                   | “I want better health.”       |
| “What did you used to do?”                   | “I used to hike / read / see friends / train.”                                                      | “I used to have more energy.” |

When two or more independent sources state the same desired action, promote it from scene / hypothesis to final angle candidate. Until then, do not add it merely because it sounds like good copy.

References

[1]: User-supplied `pasted_content.txt` , lines 3–94 — Energy Ladder methodology and corpus-level counts.

[2]: 07_ANGLE_DEEP_DIVE/02_MANUALLY_VALIDATED_SIMPLE_ANGLES.md , source IDs quoted above. Every listed final candidate traces to its preselected preserved source units.